

To Whom It May Concern:

Shark Hookers is a volunteer shark catch-tag-release team with an enduring goal of shark conservation and education. As such, we strive to partner with organizations that not only can help promote our goals for saving wildlife, but that also stand for leaving a positive impact on the world, even if it is in a different industry.

We are proud and thankful to have partnered with our local Keiser University on two occasions. Not only in promoting our cause, but by also having students, faculty and staff come out to assist with the shark tagging process. In fact, there is presently a tagged shark named "Francis" that was caught, tagged and released by a current Keiser University Sports Medicine and Fitness Technology student. Between the actual participation of Keiser University personnel and the awareness spread by the Keiser University social media platforms, Sharks Hookers is proud to have teamed with your university in making further progress in the survivability of these amazing animals.

Thank you for being a part of our community. Keiser University not only continues to provide quality education for generations of people, but has also taken steps with us in ensuring that those generations can appreciate wildlife that may otherwise no longer exist without the presence of supporters like your institution.

Respectfully,
